That element is the foundation upon which the better idea of life is constructed: in a smile; upon that element intellectual enjoyment and kindness of heart are erected. The simple touch that illumines this smile is a benefit to mankind. Sourness may be deep, but it is not inspiring. Bitterness may be heavy in its thought, but it is not proper food for the soul. The last days of Carlyle, both sour and bitter, did not shed one ray of light upon the man. The last days of Hood, to the ponderous mind may have been light, yet they made many a smile and were a blessing to mankind.
